Having found my way as a woman in ministry as a member of a conservative denomination, the issue of the biblical roles for women is one that is close to my heart. It's always refreshing when I come across someone with a perspective like Kris Vallotton's, who genuinely wants to see women set free to follow God's leadership in their lives. His new book, Fashioned to Reign, explores the biblical basis for empowering women to minister freely in the church. It's written in an approachable, easy to read style. Biblical exegesis is interwoven with profiles of powerful women leaders. There's much to like about this book, although I do have a few concerns. The strongest section of this book--and the part I was most interested in-- were the chapters in which Vallotton deals with the "gotcha" passages like 1 Corinthians 14:34-35 and 1 Timothy 2:12-14. Generally his arguments are familiar to readers familiar with an egalitarian point of view. In a nutshell, he suggests that 1 Cor. 14:34-35 is a Corinthian question Paul quotes and then refutes. He also follows the line of argumentation that suggests the cultural background of Artemis worship underlined Paul's comments to Timothy in Ephesus. Vallotton reads the passage as a specific word to a specific church, not a prohibition against all women teaching all men for all time. I appreciated his observation that none of the New Testament churches actually had the whole New Testament. If that's the case and excluding women from eldership is such a key factor, why did Paul only restrict women's roles in three letters? Especially since, as Vallotton rightly points out, there is a long legacy of female leaders and prophets in the Old Testament that continues into the New Testament period.
